“The Poppy”

*Birdsong silent, commended to die,
knee deep in mud, their bodies piled high.
brave young heroes, who would not yield,
blood red it flowed in Flanders Field.*

*No more rifle or gun did they wield
their resting place now, a far foreign field, Heartbroken loved ones, never to see,
they gave their lives, it was God's decree.*

*Bleak and barren, where nothing would grow,
except for the poppy, row upon row.
Heroes they fell, their fate always sealed,
Blood red the colour of Flanders Field.*

*The poppy, resilient, delicate and strong,
a reminder of brave men, lost in the throng.
Remembrance Sunday, we honour the brave,
Flanders Field poppies, adorning their graves.*

Photograph Courtesy of Carl Ryan, is of "Maen Llia" a large standing stone situated on the moorland of the Brecon Beacons. The stone is surrounded by legend and myth, with the Druids being involved somewhere along the line. They were learned and religious individuals, however there is very little written about them"

"Maen Llia"

*Standing for centuries, an immovable giant,
Druids her masters, spiritual or science.
A Shamanic religion, shrouded in mystery,
A monolith diamond, confined now to history*

*High on the Beacons, so vibrant she stands,
Grey, weather worn, at the Druids' command.
Surrounded by nature, winds strong and fast,
Storm clouds rolling, a dark shadow cast.*

*To serve what purpose, religious or burial,
These questions posed, since time immemorial.
No written accounts, all secrets concealed,
Her legacy, now folklore, if one's to believe.*

*With evening suns dimming, long shadows are cast,
a thirst that needs quenching, resurrecting the past.
Slowly moving across moorland, her secrets untold,
Druids' spirits abounding, to them she beholds.*
